Isaiah House is a 13-bed transitional home for men who have completed a substance abuse program. We accept men of all races, cultures and denominations. We are not equipped to accept men with a record of sexual assault or violence.

We will provide support for continued sobriety, address spiritual, physical and mental health, promote godly manhood, address educational and employment needs, as well as money management.

All applicants interviewed will be accepted upon their true and evident desire to be set free from addiction. Approved applicants must show a willingness to participate in the Isaiah House program, and possess medical and mental stability.

The Problem

*All I need is a job, a car, and a woman," said John,an alcoholic who had just graduated from a six month residential treatment program.

He got the car, the job and ran off the woman. He rented a cheap studio apartment, threw his belongings on the bed and headed to the store to buy a six-pack. After popping open the seventh beer, he was pulled over and arrested by a police officer. Another DUI. Sound familiar?

The Situation:

Many men having successfully completed a substance abuse program are not ready or fully prepared to be integrated back into society or the homes they left. Many are left without viable transportation, housing, or jobs. Some lack the skills to even succeed in these areas. Without help, the propensity to slip back into substance abuse and old habits is probable. Evidence of this problem is reflected in the increased number of first time and repeat offenders in drug courts, jails and prisons.

Evidence is in the number of broken families and children now in State care or living with relatives. Evidence is in the number of drug related thefts, automobile accidents, domestic violence and disturbances of the peace.

The Solution:

Provide housing and meals at an affordable cost. Offer care, training, and counseling in all areas applicable to the recovering addict. Provide assistance in finding employment. Help secure independent housing and locate a church community. Assist with family reunification and restoration of broken relationships.
